(4.2.0, the latest available version).Q: Is the C "stdio.h" header the only way to get formatted output? I'm creating a sample app for learning about C, I want to write a short program that will display a "Hello" string, using "printf" to print the text, in a plain black font, in a box, with 2 spaces between the "Hello" string and the "World". I have included the header file "stdio.h" and set my #include to "stdio.h" also to avoid any other errors. #include int main() { printf(" Hello, world! "); return 0; } However when I build my code and run the program I can't see any text on the screen (and when I look at the output console it says "(blank)") A: Have a look at the man page for printf. It has a warning (in bold) for a command line argument: FORMAT string A format string controls how printf() interprets the value of the following argument. You need to add a formatting string (as a %s in your case), in addition to the argument to write to stdout. You should also be using fputs() or putc(), not printf(). A: By default, stdout is line-buffered. That means any text written to it is stored in an internal buffer, and written out when the buffer is full or when a newline character is encountered. This may cause the output to occur in spurts as each fragment of text is written. The default for several popular Unix variants is to have each line written as it is. Some implementations of printf or other programs may have an option to automatically append newlines to the output, but the way the core library works means that you need to use that as a workaround in your own programs. The problem here is that printf does not provide a way to request a newline directly. It works around this by calling fprintf or equivalent and asking the target stream not to bother buffering the data
